FIELDS of study

This collection offers basic information on programs, degrees, and institutions in France in a range of disciplines. One section of each brief detailing the skills and career paths associated with the discipline is intended to guide the staff of Campus France's local offices in their interviews with students.

DEGREES

The briefs in this series describe degrees and related arrangements, including 2- and 3-year technical programs; degrees in art, architecture, business, and engineering; doctoral training and joint supervision of dissertations; one-year specialized master's programs; and tests and diplomas in teaching French as a foreign language. Briefs are downloadable from the program catalogs at the licence (bachelor) and master levels.

SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH disciplines

The purpose of this collection is to promote major areas of French research: agronomy, archaeology, biology, climatology, chemistry, mathematics, nanotechnologies, neuroscience, physics, sociology, and more. It covers cross-disciplinary fields as well: biotechnology, environmental studies, musicology, renewable energy, and more. The briefs are downloadable from the search function in the section of the website devoted to France's doctoral schools.

Notes, studies and stats

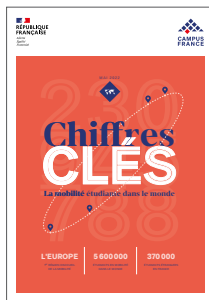

Detailed information on international student mobility and systems of education around the world: key figures, analysis, and perspectives.

> Resources Center
> Note studies and stats

KEY FIGURES

An annual publication, Campus France's "Key Figures" is an analytical and comparative survey of major trends in student mobility in France and the world. This reference tool tracks changes in every type of mobility (inbound/outbound; degree programs/exchanges) and connects them to countries' strategies for attracting international students.

REGIONAL Dynamics

Each publication in the "Regional Dynamics" collection describes the current state of higher education, international student mobility, and cooperative programs in a specific geographical area.

NOTES

Each of the "Notes" sheds light on an aspect of student mobility. The revival of distance education, doctoral mobility in France, and the hosting of refugees in France are three examples of recent analyses produced by Campus France.

Brief Notes

Each issue in the "Briefs" series summarizes a specific topic in international mobility. The topics covered in 2020 were student mobility in the United States and staying on to work in the host country.

REPÈRES STUDIES

The series invites French and international experts to "think mobility."

COUNTRY Files (46)

Each issue of the “Country Files” series explores the major mobility issues of a single country and describes the promotional activities planned there with a view to giving French institutions and their partners insight into that country.

COUNTRY Focus

This collection draws attention to countries that are expanding the mobility of their students. It describes the major features of the country’s higher education system and the promotional and cooperative directions that are likely to be emphasized, thus enabling those active in student mobility to target their partnership efforts more effectively.

MOBILITY note cards by country (149)

This series presents key statistics on student mobility in the countries examined—including figures on each country’s inbound and outbound mobility and the number of that country’s students coming into France.

COUNTRY Research Files (45)

A gold mine of information on research in individual countries, this collection summarizes key data on the country’s research enterprise. Funding for research, the volume of research conducted, the internationalization of research efforts, and principal research actors are included in the data.

OBSERVATORY

Campus France has established an observatory on international student mobility to monitor trends and changes in the field. Through the observatory, Campus France is providing a wealth of previously unpublished assessments rich in valuable lessons. The latest issue in the series deals with the hosting of international students in France.
